Prediction of root proliferation in a small androgen-insensitive prostate cancer patient on an enzyme-altered diet. The medical androgen blockade therapy has been shown to be effective in treating androgen-insensitive prostate cancer (AIPC). However, the mechanisms of tumor growth in AIPC still remain unclear. The aim of this study was to investigate whether the successful treatment of AIPC with an enzyme-altered diet in combination with flutamide can predict tumor regression and the time to tumor progression. A prostate cancer patient with an average PSA of 55.5 ng/ml underwent therapy with an enzyme-altered diet in combination with flutamide for more than 3 years and had no recurrence of tumor. The relationship between tumor volume and proliferation was examined by Ki-67 immunohistochemistry in biopsy tissues before and after treatment. The median follow-up period was 18.7 months. A partial remission was observed in the prostate on repeat biopsy after 3 years of treatment, and the Ki-67 labeling index (Ki-67 LI) decreased significantly. A regression of tumor volume was observed, and a linear correlation between the Ki-67 LI of the pretreatment and Ki-67 LI of the post-treatment was observed in the prostate. The ratio of Ki-67 LI of the post-treatment/pretreatment Ki-67 LI was significantly greater than that of nontumor regions. Moreover, the ratio of Ki-67 LI of the post-treatment/pretreatment Ki-67 LI was significantly correlated with the Ki-67 LI of tumor regions. This is the first study to reveal the mechanism of tumor growth by analysis of Ki-67 expression in biopsy samples before and after therapy, and the time to tumor progression after medical androgen blockade therapy.

Genetic structure of K1-strains of Plasmodium falciparum in Malaysia. The genetic structure of parasite populations, particularly the degree of genetic variation within a population, can be used to understand the nature of the selective pressures acting on it, and hence can be valuable for the design of a strategy for malaria control.
