Asterisk 2.8.5 release notes Asterisk 2.8.5 release notes We are pleased to announce the release of Asterisk 2.8.5, a maintenance release for the 2.8 series of Asterisk. This release supports the upcoming 17.10 release of Ubuntu and CentOS. Change Log: General: This release removes the deprecated esb_event_queue_lock() call on select(), this is no longer supported. Core: With this release we are shifting base to Cmake. This will allow others to make changes to the base of Asterisk. The Asterisk source code has been split into their own git repository where the source code resides in the Asterisk project. Instead of 'asterisk' in the git repository, 'asterisk' is now 'asterisk-core-c'. There have been a lot of fixes over the 2.8.x series to the Chatter, Media, IAX2 and SIP stacks. Bugfixes have been included in this release as well. Q: What is the rationale behind Microsoft's decision to use the codenames instead of the names of the Release Candidates of Windows? It happens every time: Microsoft posts a new build of Windows, and we all expect it to be the one that the next edition is going to be named after. But the name is never given, and instead we see the codename of the next release, which is the one that Microsoft will always use. Why did Microsoft do this? And is there any logic behind it? A: According to a 2011 interview, it wasn't actually their choice. Microsoft said that people's expectations forced the company to alter its naming strategy. When you have a product numbering system that goes 1.0, 2.0, 2.10, 3.0, 4.0, 5.0, 6.0 and now 8.0, this means people have a lot of expectation, said Steven Sinofsky, Microsoft's president for Windows. Sinofsky said the company "has to avoid ambiguity and confusion" when releasing a new version of the operating system. "When we put the product out, there's a lot of people waiting," Sinofsky said. "Why would we want to introduce confusion and ambiguity?" A: I believe there are
