Combined effect of calcium and carbonate on nitrification in a sandy soil column. Sandy soils are commonly enriched with calcium carbonate (CaCO_3), but little is known about the combined effect of these elements on nitrification, especially in the presence of an organic carbon source. In this work, the combined effect of CaCO_3 and N-NH_4^+ on nitrification was studied in a column packed with a sandy soil. It was observed that nitrification occurs when the soil column is packed with sand only. When CaCO_3 and N-NH_4^+ were added to the column, it was found that the nitrification reaction only occurred at the sand-water interface (H3/20cm), the reaction height declined sharply with the distance from the bottom of the column and disappeared at a depth of 20cm. The results clearly show that the presence of CaCO_3 in sand causes the nitrification reaction to occur at a point at the water-sand interface, which is near the point of the natural origin of N-NH_4^+ , i.e., the leachate form nitrate-N ($\text{NO}_3\text{-N}$). Furthermore, the reaction rate decreased as the concentration of CaCO_3 increased. The combined effect of CaCO_3 and N-NH_4^+ on the reduction of dissolved organic carbon (DOC) was also investigated, using the addition of CaCO_3 and N-NH_4^+ at different concentrations as a pretreatment. No DOC reduction was observed when the soil column was packed with sand only. However, when a 0.02% NaHCO_3 solution was added to the soil column, it was observed that the addition of CaCO_3 enhanced the DOC reduction. The results suggest that the dissolving of CaCO_3 in sand was the primary reason that caused the enhanced DOC reduction. Based on the measurements of the concentration gradient of CaCO_3 and N-NH_4^+ on the reduction of DOC, it is suggested that CaCO_3 as well as N-NH_4^+ had some interactions with DOC during the DOC reduction.

Elevate Your Learning Goals! If you're just starting out on your career journey, you may have a difficult time figuring out where to go and what to do with your life. Sometimes we run into this problem because we have been too busy leading a busy life trying to survive. We need to take an honest look at our current skills and abilities and determine what we need to get better at. We also need to take a look at the way we think and the way we go about learning things. We need to develop a new way to think, learn, and to teach. We need to focus on developing deeper learning goals because we need to have real and tangible goals with a way of measuring the results. Yes! We need to focus on our learning goals but what if they are too daunting to think about? How are we even supposed to learn goals like that? If this sounds like you, then you're in the right place! It's about this time of year that high school seniors are taking their SATs, ACTs, and their college applications for college. As they are taking these tests, here's what I'd like them to think about The two most important things that I would like high school seniors to think about are: What skills and abilities do you currently have that will help you land a college degree or internship in the future? What are you passionate about? Don't think you have to do a 4-year college degree for these questions to apply. You can also apply these to yourself today. You may not know what skills and abilities you need to develop but you definitely have a passion. If you apply the same questions to yourself, you may be surprised by what you come up with. My greatest learning goal is I want to learn how to create my own course that helps other people develop their own skills and abilities Tell Us What You Think! What are some of your biggest learning goals?

How do you go about achieving those? You can share your comments below or even send us an email so we can keep the ideas coming! [Magnetoencephalographic (MEG) study in children with Down syndrome and dyslexia].
