The record also establishes that the mother sought advice from legal counsel before signing the consent form that allowed adoption. We conclude that the best interests of the children will be served by allowing the children to remain in their present foster home, and that their best interests are further served by delaying the adoption. As stated, the father's motion in this case was filed in September 1994, the mother's in October 1994. At the time that the father filed his motion, most of the children had been removed from the parents' custody. The record does not reflect that the father has been able to assume responsibility for the care of the children since February 1994. The record also does not reflect that the father has been able to visit with the children since July 1994. The record further does not show that the father has paid any child support. We conclude that the children were entitled to reasonable notice and a hearing on the father's motion to have the adoption declared null and void.

For all of the foregoing reasons, we overrule the father's points of error. In his fifth point of error, the father contends that the trial court erred in finding the court's order terminating the father's parental rights was supported by clear and convincing evidence. The father asserts that the evidence is legally and factually insufficient to support the order. As stated, the court's judgment is supported by the record. In this case, the evidence was not disputed, and the only question to be decided was whether the evidence was clearly and convincingly sufficient to support the court's finding. Thus, the appropriate standard of review is whether the trial court abused its discretion in finding the evidence was clear and convincing. In re Keeling, 988 S.W.2d at 719. We conclude that the court did not abuse its discretion in finding clear and convincing evidence supported the judgment. We overrule the father's fifth point of error. In his sixth point of error, the father contends that the trial court erred in finding that the father's failure to comply with the provisions of court ordered
